Right now we're talking about the game that team JAB is making for the game jam. It won't show up. It's recording but basically it's an action RPG.

You start in a level and there are enemies that spawn with you inside the level. There are elemental fields within the level that you can interact with to gain the powers of that element. When you attack and defeat the enemy of an element, you get that element. The kind of challenge of the game is trying to use the elements in the best way you possibly can, defeat all the enemies, and go down to the next floor.

There are infinite floors and things get progressively and progressively and progressively harder until it's basically impossible. That's where the skill tree and items come in. You get experience points from defeating enemies and defeating harder and harder enemies and you can upgrade the skill tree. There are certain things locked off in the skill tree that are based on achievements in the game. Let's just say, "Defeat 5 fire enemies at the same time." That would be an unlock achievement for you to unlock better and better skills.

There are also items that the enemies drop on a very very rare chance and you get better and better items the lower level you are.

Camera perspective is an isometric view from the top down. The camera would follow the player as they move around the environment.

There are 6 elements: darkness, light, earth, wind, fire, and water. They all kind of play off each other. Water is really good against fire, that sort of stuff.

Mosaic-based art style, set with a dark fantasy kind of theme

An action RPG game that you can kill some time with. It's kind of like an auto game: you just play it for a little bit, you get stronger, get stronger skill points and get stronger items, and then you leave when you're bored. Then you come back to it and it's kind of like that daily routine

Beating level after level, barely winning by the skin of your teeth but still constantly progressing against overwhelming odds

It kind of combines action RPG games with a little bit of a puzzle element and kind of has that rogue-like meta progression

It was made as response to not knowing what the character would be, and us trying to make a unique character and a unique setting to make us stand apart
